THE RESERVE OF THE PARTY PARTY. Although it was late March, it was still nipping cold. A red fire reared in the base burner inside old Gib's store Old Gib bimself sat close beside it, his eye ranging all the miscellaneous mer lise which crowded shelves and floor. His three clerks had been on the Jump all morning, but toward noon ie a lull. He was about to send two of them off to dinner when the door opened wide, and Merton came through, with Joe Beenam in his wake and Dr. Waters and Lew Bayne marching solemnly behind. Joe's face was white, his eyes brilliant, his figure tense in every line. Indeed he looked desperate, and his voice rang hard as he said, stopping short three feet

"Mr. Ezell, I have come to ask you, here in the presence of these witnesses, to release me from my promise. You know well how it was given-with a total misspprehension of the truth." "You mean you want to take my daughter, as well as my trade, and leave me, a cripple, to starvel" old Gib

Joe set his teeth. "I mean nothing of the sort!" he said. "Give me your daughter, and our home shall be yours. I will serve and care for you as I would for my own father"-
